Why Safety Matters

Keeping workers safe is good for everyone. When people get hurt on the job, it can be painful, stressful, and expensive for both workers and employers. Injuries slow down work, increase costs, and can impact morale.

That's why making safety a priority just makes sense. A safer workplace means fewer injuries, lower costs, and healthier, happier employees.

The Workers' Compensation Administration (WCA) is here to help. We offer free support and resources to improve workplace safety because your team's well-being matters.

Safety Inspections

If a business pays $15,000 or more for workers' compensation insurance, or if it is self-insured, it must obtain a safety inspection every year. This is required by law.

Here's what you need to know:

When to Complete the Inspection

You must do the inspection within 60 days of starting or renewing your workers' compensation insurance policy.

What to Submit

After completing your inspection, you must send proof to the WCA. This can include a copy of your inspection checklist or other documentation.

Need help?

WCA safety consultants are available to answer questions and guide you through the process. Don't hesitate to reach out—we're here to support you.

Risk Reduction Program

When a workplace has had several injuries or safety concerns, the WCA may invite the employer to join our Risk Reduction Program. This program is designed to help businesses take a closer look at what's causing injuries and find ways to make things better.

By focusing on education, practical tools, and ongoing support, the Risk Reduction Program helps employers create a culture of safety that protects workers and keeps operations running smoothly. Our goal is to support you in making your workplace a healthier, safer place for all.
